

Modern Cattleya Hybrids have several distinct advantages over the Species plants. Most vigorous hybrids, while they have a regular blooming season when the majority of their blooms are produced, will bloom a second, or third time during the year. Having been grown "in captivity" all their lives, they usually make better looking plants than the jungle-grown species, many of which are rather rough and battered in appearance if they've only been in this country a year or two.

If you want a wide variety of colors, sizes and forms among your Cattleyas, you'll find it in the following hybrids. All were freshly repotted in top grade osmunda, in new Orchid pots, after their last blooming period. They are in 5, 5½ or 6-inch pots, according to the way the plant grows. They vary in their growth habits, too.

In a listing such as this, it is impossible to state which plants are in sheath, for that is a constantly changing condition. But, whenever possible, I select plants that will be coming into bloom before too long. You can help me do so by looking for the regular bloom season, by naming a second or third choice, or by telling me the color you prefer and allowing me to select the plant for you.
